

Correction to my article on Apiocera,
in the Berl. Ent. Zeit. 1883, p. 287—294
by C. R. Osten Sacken.

Since the publication of my article I have for the first time seen the Chilean Apiocera brevicornis in the Berlin Museum and have ascertained that in Dr. Philippi's figure (Verh. Z. B. Ges. 1865, Tab. 25. f. 26) the venation is not correctly represented. Since then, at my request, Dr. Karsch kindly examined the specimens again, and confirmed what I had seen. The second of the veins, issuing from the discal cell, ends beyond the apex of the wing, and not before it, as represented on the figure; in other words, there is very little difference in the venation of all the known Apiocerae. The two species, which I have described from Mexico and California, differ from the others in having the anterior branch of the third vein end in the margin a little beyond the end of the first vein, and not in that end; but as the distance is very small, this difference has but little importance.

The discovery of this error in Dr. Philippi's figure renders necessary the following changes in my above-quoted article in the Berl. Ent. Zeit. 1883. Strike out the following passages:

1) On p. 291, the whole paragraph beginning on line 18 from top, with the words: „Among the species etc.” and ending on line 33 with „the species of Apiocera.“

2) On p. 293 at the bottom the paragraph beginning with: „It remains for me etc.” up to its end on p. 294 „drop Anypenus for the present.“

3) On the same p. 294 the whole line six from bottom and the word „venation“ on the following line.

On the same p. 294, line 4 from bottom, insert the word „slightly,“ before „different“ and strike out the word „again“ on the following line.

So much for trusting figures, in the absence of specimens!
